The pistils will very likely be ripe in the next buttercups it flies to; then the ripe pollen-grains that are shaken off the hairs will enter the pistils and be carried by the pollen-tubes down into the seeds. This is the way that insects fly from flower to flower, leaving the pollen and taking away the honey, which well repays them for all their labour. On a fine summer s day, when you go into the country, you must watch, and you will see that every coloured flower is visited by some kind of insect, and if you examine the tiniest flower with your little glass, you will find a little workman busy within. If you listen as well as watch, you will hear their voices, for they fill the air with a soft murmuring noise that sounds as if they were talking...
